

with the rioters? Would the city be responsible for accident or even the death of such individual under such conditions? I think not.

England and her allies started out to conquer the central allies by the starvation plan. The latter in retaliation started the same plan, and is enforcing it by submarine warfare.

If there is any more contemptible method of waging warfare than by the starvation policy, I do not know it. I would a thousand times rather be blown up by a submarine. People can keep out of the way of submarines. They are not obliged to take passage on ships that are liable to encounter U-boats. When you attempt to starve a nation, women, children and the aged are the victims. They are in their own homes, where they have a right to be.

What did we do to prevent England from carrying out her starvation policy? But she is getting a taste of her own medicine now and she finds it unpalatable.

She does not want us to go to war with Germany. She knows that in that event the latter would blockade our coasts with her submarines and mines and our traffic with herself would be absolutely paralyzed.

I believe that it should be our policy to hold aloof from all of the belligerents; have no dealings with any of them until they are willing to talk peace.

This fight across the seas is not our fight and we should keep our hands off. Although we have been injured by both sides, we can afford to forget it for the time being and resume the role of peacemaker.

We can keep ourselves busy looking after our own shortcomings and preparing for the judgment that is sure to come upon our own nation as well as upon all other nations.

I believe that if Germany had not offered to talk peace with her enemies that her people would have rebelled against her. If England continues to hold out against any peace moves she will face revolution and subsequent anarchy.

I would not put it beyond the people of my own nation, either, to rise up in rebellion should its government plunge them into war on the present flimsy pretexts.

God grant that wisdom may be given our president and our congress in these troublous times, and that the Golden Rule will guide us in our dealings with all nations and with the lesser units of our own nation.—
Elfreda Benjamin.

BILLY SUNDAY.—Billy Monday certainly has Billy Sunday spotted. Mr. Monday go to it, you are doing fine.

I very much dislike seeing such expressions as the following in print, but there are times when it is well to print such things in order to enlighten the public as to the character of such men as Sunday. Says Sunday:

"If a minister believes and teaches evolution, he is a stinking skunk, a hypocrite and a liar. I don't believe your old bastard theory of evolution, either; I believe its pure jackass nonsense."

Mr. Arthur M. Lewis, you are a hypocrite and all your science and learning is nothing compared to the "superior knowledge" of Mr. Sunday. (I hesitate to put a Mr. before the name of Billy Sunday.)

It has been said that Rev. George R. Wallace of Toledo privately advised Billy to be tolerant toward the doctrine of evolution. For his trouble Mr. Wallace got the following the next day at a Sunday meeting.

Mr. Wallace was sitting on the platform at this meeting and Sunday turned upon him, shook his fist and yelled:

"Stand up there, you evolutionist! Stand up with the atheists and the infidels and the adulterers and go to hell."
